Aims and Objectives

The Journal of Energy and Natural Resources Law is the leading refereed publication in the field of energy and natural resources law, offering global coverage of legal issues within these sectors. The Journal covers the law in these specific areas:

- Oil and gas
- Minerals (covering legal questions relating to minerals, including non-fuel minerals and the nuclear fuel cycle)
- Coal
- Water
- Renewable energy (including legal aspects concerning hydro and geothermal power, solar, tidal, wind, and ocean energy, and timber and agricultural waste use)

Submissions

The Journal welcomes article submissions that illuminate legal problems or issues currently faced by governments, companies, and international organizations, by setting them within their general legal, economic, or political context. Book reviews are also accepted.

Of particular interest are articles that record the actual experience of lawyers resolving practical problems or developing legal devices or techniques, as well as academics whose research addresses energy and natural resources within the larger context of law, economics, or politics. Normally articles should not exceed 10,000 words in length. Exceptionally, where the nature of the topic warrants it, the Editor will be prepared to consider longer articles. All articles should include a word count (including footnotes) on the title page.

The Journal also welcomes the submission (especially by practitioners) of shorter notes and comments of up to 3,000 words on matters that may not lend themselves to a full-length article.

All submissions should be emailed to the Editor at Jerl@law.du.edu.
