Lathrop Lectureship Honors 1896 Graduate; Highlights Impact of Women on College of Law

The DU College of Law and the Colorado Women's Bar Association have agreed to cosponsor an annual Mary Lathrop Lecture in Law, to recognize the remarkable career of one of the law school's earliest women graduates. Mary Frances Lathrop (JD'96) was the first woman member of the American Bar Association as well as the Denver and Colorado Bar Associations, and Colorado's foremost woman lawyer throughout most of her fifty years in practice.

This decision came about directly through the efforts of Carol Musso, second-year DU law student and member of the DU Women's Law Caucus. Musso first learned of Lathrop's achievements last fall when the Denver attorney was inducted into the Colorado Hall of Fame, and decided to research her career further. She concluded, "I can identify in 1988 with the way Mary Lathrop must have felt in 1896. She is truly an inspiration."

Her proposal for a memorial was endorsed by an enthusiastic Women's Law Caucus and then by the law school administration, which proposed cosponsorship to the Women's Bar Association.

Says Assistant Dean Mark Caldwell, "Our intention is that the speaker in this annual series will always be a woman with strong ties to the legal community. The subject matter of the lecture will not necessarily relate to women's issues as that would not be in keeping with Mary Lathrop's personal philosophy. She preferred to be identified simply as a lawyer, and not as a woman lawyer."

31-YEAR-OLD CAREER CHANGER

The woman whose career is an inspiration ninety years after her law school graduation was a 31-year-old career changer when she earned her LLB degree in 1896, completing her course work in 18 months with a grade average of 96.

She was a Quaker born in Philadelphia who began a career in journalism at the age of 19, reporting on industrial news. She covered a riot in Cripple Creek, a race war involving Chinese laborers in San Francisco, and traveled as a reporter in China. Like many other early Coloradans, she moved to the state originally for health reasons.

She made her mark on the legal scene early, arguing a case before the Colorado Supreme Court in 1898. (She was the first woman to do so.) The case involved the George W. Clayton bequest to found a college for orphan boys, which was contested by a relative of the deceased. She won.

She continued to practice in the areas of probate and real estate until

Course in Famous Criminal Trials Profiles 'True Advocate of Justice'

Romance came to the law school curriculum this spring in the form of a course in "Famous Criminal Trials" taught by part-time faculty member Theodore A. Borrillo.

Explaining his objective, Borrillo says, "I want to develop a profile of a great lawyer, and to show what the true advocate of justice is made of.

"Are we creating lawyers who have the ability to create justice?" Borrillo asks rhetorically. "How much insight do we get from reading ten thousand cases? Justice Holmes said law should be practiced in the grand manner, and that's the tradition I want to present."

Students have flocked to sign up for Famous Criminal Trials. With 50 students, the class is filled to capacity, and as many more applicants were turned away. "It's my favorite course," says one student. "These trials are all new to me. I should have known about them before, but I didn't."

Associate Dean James Wallace, who accepted with enthusiasm Borrillo's proposal to design and teach the course, says, "This is a fine example of the way our curriculum is enriched by part-time teachers from the community."

The famous trials around which the class is structured include World War II war crimes trials ("Ex post facto prosecutions"), the Bruno Hauptmann trial ("a product of hysteria, defying constitutional standards"), the Leopold-Loeb case ("notable for the courage of Clarence Darrow in taking on a hopeless case"), trials of the McCarthy era, and the Sacco-Vanzetti trial, which prompted Borrillo to design the course.

The course content combines trial tactics, history, and an introduction to great advocates. Borrillo, who also aims to illustrate the power of language, uses examples from Arthur Miller and from Justice Robert Jackson's eloquent closing argument at the Nuremberg Trials in his class. He plans to conclude the course with a video of Martin Luther King's "I have a dream" address.

"I'm delighted by the class," says Borrillo, who has taught courses at the law school often, beginning in 1959 with a stint on the full-time faculty. He has since been a chief deputy district attorney in both Denver and Adams counties, and is now in private practice emphasizing criminal law. He holds the LLB degree from St. John's University and an LLM from Harvard Law School.

Alumni in Seven Cities Hear Law School Update

The DU Law Alumni office is reaching out to graduates around the country this spring, with a series of updates on the law school and the profession. Dean Edward A. Dauer has met since March with alumni in Colorado Springs, Albuquerque, Las Vegas, Newport Beach (CA), Dallas, and Chicago. He has been accompanied at most of these by Professor Edward Richards, who spoke on the legal implications of the proliferation of AIDS. Richards is an expert in the areas of law and public health.

Carver, Linn to Retire in 1988

Two DU law professors, each an authority in his own field, will retire from the faculty this year. John A. Carver, an expert in natural resources law, began teaching at DU in 1972; John Phillip (Phil) Linn, whose field is labor law and arbitration, has taught at DU since 1958.

Carver joined the law faculty after a long career in public service. A former Undersecretary of the Interior, he was a member of the Federal Power Commission for six years prior to coming to Denver. His exit from that position was marked by an editorial in the Oil and Gas Journal describing him as a "model administrator" and stating, "He will be remembered for a very irritating quality: he was usually right."

Professor Carver has agreed to teach part time in 1988-89.

Linn is former vice president of the National Academy of Arbitrators, has been a Master in the U.S. District Courts of the Tenth and Eighth Circuits, hearing Equal Employment Opportunity cases, and is proud that as an ad hoc arbitrator in many industries in 39 states he has never had an arbitral award modified or vacated by any court.
DU Law Library Receives Airline Crash Documents

DU's Westminster Law Library is taking part in a pioneering effort to facilitate multidistrict, complex litigation in U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado. Chief Judge Sherman Finesilver (JD '52) designated the library as the official documents and exhibits depository for cases filed in connection with the November 15, 1987 crash of Continental Airlines Flight 1713 at Stapleton International Airport.

Judge Finesilver is presiding over the pretrial proceedings in all lawsuits arising from the crash which have been filed in federal courts. His order facilitates the discovery process by making numerous documents and exhibits available to every litigant in a single location. It is believed to be the first time that a law school has been designated as an adjunct to the federal courts, and the depository may be a prototype for the management of other complex litigation.

Initially, twenty-two attorneys from throughout the country had registered for access to the depository. The depository is maintained under strict security and contains facilities for attorneys to copy and study documents. Costs of instituting and maintaining the depository will be borne by litigants.

Colorado Supreme Court Visits DU

The Davis Auditorium in the Lowell Thomas Law Building was filled with spectators when the Supreme Court of Colorado sat at DU on April 28. Justices heard oral arguments on three cases. This was the second time the Supreme Court sat at the College of Law; the first occasion was in 1986. The Court makes a practice of meeting away from its chambers in the Supreme Court Building in order to make its activities more accessible to the community.

Scholarship Donors Honored

Donors of special scholarships benefiting DU law students in 1987-88 were recognized at a reception held at the College of Law on March 29. The 64 students who received honorary scholarships were also invited. Dean Edward A. Dauer said, in thanking the honorees, "It is difficult to imagine any finer way in which a benefactor can serve this University, the profession, and meritorious students, than by creating a scholarship program at the College of Law. We are all grateful to you for your support."

Law firms recognized for their donations were Holland & Hart; Holme, Roberts & Owen; Pryor, Carney & Johnson; Hall & Evans; Gorsuch, Kriegs, Campbell, Walker and Grover; Long & Jaudon; Sherman & Howard; Morrisard & Ross; Isaacson, Rosenbaum, Spiegelman, Woods, Levy & Snow.

Representatives of the Joe and Betty Alpert Foundation, the Viola Vestal Coulter Foundation, Trasco and Professor John Carver, Jr., the Bal F. and Hilda N. Swan Foundation, Arthur Young & Company, and the Zarleno family, all of which have created scholarship funds, were also recognized.
Admission Applications For 1988 Show Increase
Applications for admission to the College of Law for Fall 1988 are up by 11 percent above the number received at the same time last year, according to Claudia Tomlin, Director of Admission and Financial Aid. This figure reflects a nationwide trend reported by the Law School Admissions Council.

Quality of the applicant pool, as indicated by scores on the Law School Admissions Test and undergraduate grades, remains steady and shows a slight improvement over last year.

Great West Life Creates John A. Love Scholarship
The Great West Life Assurance Company has established a law scholarship in honor of John A. Love (LLB '41) that will be worth approximately $100,000.

The company will provide a full-tuition scholarship for each of the next ten years for a DU law student to be selected on the basis of merit and financial need.

Love, former Governor of Colorado, was a member of the Board of the insurance company for ten years, retiring from that position in 1987. He was a trustee of the University of Denver between 1974 and 1987.

REGIONAL WINNERS

Weissman Gift Aids Public Interest Clerkship Program
A gift of $10,000 from Ms. Tamara Weissman in honor of her late husband James Weissman (JD '76) will assure the continuation of the Public Interest Clerkship Program at the College of Law. Ms. Weissman has pledged an additional $15,000 to that program over succeeding years.

Weissman, an assistant district attorney for Denver for seven years at the time of his death in a highway accident on September 22, 1984, was a national authority on drug abuse and juvenile justice. Head of the juvenile division at the time of his death, he was described variously as "a superb attorney with a great sense of fairness," "brilliant and versatile," and "the voice of reason and common sense." He was also a professional wine consultant.

The Public Interest Clerkship Program, entering its fourth year, enables students to work full time over the summer for public interest organizations unable to hire full-time clerks. Students arrange their own jobs and present a proposal to a committee of law faculty, staff, students and alumni who select students to be funded. The six students funded to date have worked at the Colorado Coalition for the Homeless, the Environmental Defense Fund, Colorado Public Interest Research Group, Central American Refugee Service, and the Legal Aid Society of Metropolitan Denver.

Other significant support for this program has come from the Colorado Lawyer Trust Account Foundation (COLTAF), the DU Student Bar Association, the College of Law through tuition waivers, the employers, and a large number of alumni and friends of the College of Law.
Only Cajun Law Librarian . . .

Al Coco Trades Library for Classroom

Al Coco, the only Cajun law librarian in America, has packed up his frog collection and vacated the position he has held at the University of Denver College of Law since 1972 and at other law schools since 1962. "Twenty-five years is long enough to do anything," he declares. "I have other interests and areas of expertise and want to share these with the student body."

As of June 1, Coco will assume full-time teaching duties at the law school. He will supervise clinical students in the Student Law Office during the summer term, and in the fall will begin teaching in the business area—Corporations, Unincorporated Associations, UCC I, and a new course in Advanced Legal Research.

He has long taught in the areas of legal librarianship and in the first-year Research and Writing sequence.

Coco is well known in the Denver legal community for his congenial personality and his pride in a pure Cajun heritage; all his forbears belonged to the French Canadian community that settled in Louisiana, his birthplace.

As DU’s Law Librarian, Coco has presided over a growth period that has transformed the library. His original $50,000 book budget has grown to $400,000; his three-person staff has increased to seventeen people, including eight professional librarians; his 19,000 square feet of library space has become 50,000 square feet. (During the same period, he adds, the library’s portion of the ABA’s annual questionnaire has expanded from two to twenty pages.) The advent of computerized legal research took place in this same period.

During his long tenure, Coco also had the gratifying experience of planning a law library from the ground up, as DU constructed the new Lowell Thomas Law Building on the former Colorado Women’s College campus.

Until 1985, Coco also directed one of the only two Master of Law Librarianship programs in the U.S. That program was terminated when the University of Denver closed its Graduate School of Librarianship and Information Management. The University of Washington has since discontinued its degree in law librarianship as well. Asked about the impact of this change on law libraries, Coco observed that law librarianship will have a different focus in the future in any case.

"Technological advance is moving so fast as to be mind-boggling," he says. The book form is changing; ten years from now many books will be replaced or supplemented by disks. This will make it harder to make decisions—decisions will be expensive, and will have to be correct financially and in their judgment of technological ramifications.

"This is one of the vital issues facing DU’s new law librarian in the near future," Coco says. "The other will be acquisitions. We have a fairly good collection now, but it does not yet represent the solid academic research library we need."

Coco’s stature within his profession is unsurpassed. Dean Edward A. Dauer describes him as one of the four most nationally known and respected names in law librarianship. He served as president of the American Association of Law Libraries in 1977-78, and has made professional inspection visits to twelve law schools. He has published and consulted widely in his areas of expertise. The library has benefited materially from his stature; as a member of the WESTLAW Advisory Board he has obtained five unlimited use WESTLAW terminals without charge. LEXIS has contributed three terminals on the same basis.

At its January meeting, the Law Alumni Council voted a resolution commending Coco for his services to DU law alumni in the past sixteen years.

The frog collection will not accompany Coco to his new faculty office; he says it will be taken home and passed along to his grandson.

Barbara N. Greenspahn has been appointed Director of Law Libraries and Professor of Law Library Science at the College of Law, succeeding Al Coco. Most recently Manager of Information Resources at Davis, Graham & Stubbs, she has also been associated with Library Services Professionals, a consulting firm, and the Boston University Law School Library. More about Ms. Greenspahn will appear in the next issue of the Law Alumni Newsletter.
Lathrop Lectureship...

her death in 1951, having received many honors. Her position was always "I'm either a lawyer or I'm not; don't drag me being a woman into it."

She was President of the Law Alumni Association in 1920, and in 1951 the University of Denver bestowed on her the annual Evans Award to an outstanding alumnus. She received an honorary Doctor of Laws degree from DU in 1941.

A tiny woman (five feet tall, weighing about 100 pounds), she was described as lively and outgoing. One of her special activities was entertaining enlisted servicemen at elegant restaurant dinners during World War II, and at the war's end she was recognized by the USO for having provided hospitality to an estimated 14,000 servicemen.

A HOSPITABLE ENVIRONMENT

The DU College of Law has provided a hospitable environment for women students since its beginning. Its first catalogue, printed in 1892, stated: "Women are entitled to all privileges of the school."

In fact, Mary Lathrop was not its first woman graduate; that distinction belongs to Ann Hunt, who preceded Mary Lathrop by two years as a member of the second graduating class in 1894. (Westminster Law School, founded in 1913, graduated two women in 1918.)

There were women on the full-time DU law faculty as early as 1937.

The College of Law graduated other women in 1897, 1905, 1916, and between 1922 and 1973, had at least one woman graduate each year, except for 1964.

Nevertheless, the social climate had to change radically before women could take full advantage of the law school's openness and achieve the full professional status Mary Lathrop stood for.

In 1972, when enrollment of women at DU law school was still only 15 percent and the Women's Law Caucus was founded, its co-founder Joan Temko Anyon found it necessary to state the obvious: "Women are as capable and as innately qualified (as a group) as are men to perform the functions demanded in the professional and career sections of American life."

Thereafter, progress was rapid. By 1988, when the Hon. John Kane (JD '60) addressed a senior reception following June Commencement, he could count on a laugh by observing "How gratifying it is to see that fully half the graduates here today are men."

The following year, the Hon. Jean Dubofsky of the Colorado Supreme Court, delivering the DU law commencement address, focused on the changes to be expected in the legal profession as a result of the significant numbers of women lawyers being created.

Today, the Colorado Women's Bar Association has only one item regarding the professional status of women lawyers on its agenda; it continues to urge the increase in women on the bench, particularly in non-metropolitan areas of the state.

The DU Women's Law Caucus still has its agenda, though it is far less aggressive than in 1972. A major concern is the shortage of women law faculty at DU. "We would like to see more strong female role models and mentors on the faculty," says Jeanette Madrid, Caucus President. Members intend to seek out and promote appropriate faculty candidates.

(OF more than forty full-time faculty members, only five are women.)

In the past year, in addition to promoting a memorial to Mary Lathrop, the organization has sponsored a spring orientation day for admitted students, cosponsored a lecture appearance by Sara Weddington, who at the age of 26 argued the case of Roe vs. Wade before the U.S. Supreme Court, and cooperated with the Colorado Women's Bar Association in a very successful mentor program. With some 80 members, it is one of the strongest and most visible student organizations at the law school.

SIXTEEN YEARS LATER

Joan Temko Anyon (JD '73), who is now in sole practice in San Diego, agrees that it would never be necessary today to make the statement she made in 1972. "The point really was in dispute at that time; it was an open question," she says.

"The problems are more subtle today," says Anyon, when asked about her perception of the status of professional women today. "There are still a lot of differences in the way society is structured that make the professional lives of women different from those of men. On the whole, women are working on their own to address these problems, whereas there ought to be more societal concern. Child care is a good example."

She herself is reconciling legal practice with care of her own children, and says she has chosen sole practice over association with a firm because it permits her the flexibility she needs. Much of her reforming fervor is redirected from women's rights to immigration rights today.

In Memoriam

Recently reported to the Alumni Office were the deaths of Fred D. Falkburg, JD '65, Grand Rapids, Michigan, March 6, 1981, and Walter E. Schwed, LLB '48, Riverside, California, 1985.
Friday, June 3, Is 1988 Alumni Day

The emphasis will be on "Old Friends and New Trends" during the University of Denver College of Law 1988 Alumni Day, Friday, June 3.

The day’s program will feature an afternoon professional education program, a reception and an All-Alumni Dinner highlighting reunions for law classes for the years ending in 3 and 8.

The professional education program will include presentations by two members of the College of Law faculty who will retire this year: Professors John Phillip Linn and John A. Carver, Jr. (See page 2.) They will be joined on the program by Professors Paul Stephen Dempsey and Edward P. Richards.

Professor Linn will evaluate Colorado's mandatory arbitration rule. Professor Carver's topic will concern public policy and water law. Deregulation of the nation's airlines will be the thrust of Professor Dempsey's presentation. Professor Richards will address the issue of Colorado's public health laws and AIDS.

The program will be accredited under Colorado's continuing legal education standards.

Reunion classes will be honored and have special seating at the All-Alumni Dinner.

Complete details of the 1988 Alumni Day are contained in the invitation mailed to all law alumni. Alumni not receiving an invitation or in need of additional information are asked to call the Law Alumni Office.

Raful Named Dean

Lawrence Raful, JD '75, has been named dean of the Creighton University School of Law in Omaha, Nebraska, effective in the summer of 1988.

Raful is currently serving as associate dean of admissions and student affairs at the University of Southern California Law School.

Before joining USC he served at DU as assistant director of the school's continuing education program and coordinator of the paralegal program.
